Customer Problems?

Has anyone ever been in a situation at their job where they have been yelled at by a customer? My advice to all employees in front of an angry costumer is to keep a positive attitude and not yell back at them. Let me share what happened to me.

It started when a senior citizen walked through the door of the fast food restaurant where I was on my first day of work. She ordered a meal asking for a senior drink. Not knowing what the senior drink consisted of I asked my manager. She informed me that there was not any senior drink on the menu and to give her a cup of water.

After giving her the cup of water, she took a sip, looked up at me with hate in her eyes, and let the bad words spew from her mouth. This was the worst first day of work in history. She had the vocabulary of a street rapper sounding off her knowledge of bad words. I thought to myself, "What gives her the right to yell at me like this?" No one has the right to yell at anyone this way.

Instead of yelling back at her I apologized, explained to her that there was not any senior drink on the menu and calmly walked away. As I was walking away, I could still hear her mumbling cuss words under her breath. Instead of feeling mad I felt proud.

The one thing I came to realize is that no matter what obstacle comes my way at work, I can handle it like a mature adult. I also came to realize that if she yelled at me, she has yelled at other service employees too.

My advice to all of those service employees put into a bad situation like this one is to not get mad and yell back. I assure you; you will come out the true winner.

I realize that there are those that think it is dumb to walk away from an arguing costumer, but take my advice and remember that you are the professional representing the company. By arguing back with an angry customer will place yourself as rude as the person who is yelling.

Also think about it this way: either you get yelled at for a minute or two by an angry customer you do not know nor care about, or you let everyone around you down that care about you. You could also loose your job for arguing with the customer.

If anyone is ever in this type of situation stay cool, apologize, walk away and get on with your job because you are the mature one, do not let anyone tell you different.

Movie Review

Created by screenwriter Jim Britts and director Brian Baugh, the development of a relationship with God changes a young man's view on life in the movie To Save a Life.

This movie highlights a basketball star, Jake Taylor (Randy Wayne) and his seemingly perfect life. Jake is the stereotypical high school jock; he is rich, has the cheerleader girlfriend, and has a full ride sports scholarship to the University of Louisville.

When tragedy strikes, and Jake's childhood best friend, Roger (Robert Bailey) kills himself, Jake is overcome with an overpowering guilt. As Jake's popularity grew over the years, he stopped talking to Roger and simply watched while his friends mocked Roger, feeling useless in the world, decided to take a gun to school and shoot himself.

A pastor named Chris (Joshua Weigel), sees Jake at Roger's funeral and decides to come up and talk to him. Through a cliché series of events, Jake stops partying and joins Chris's youth group. Outraged by all the kids in the group who he feels are just a bunch of fakers, Jake starts a movement to help the loners that might be feeling the way Roger did right before he killed himself.

God puts in on Jake's heart to talk to an alienated kid named Johnny (Sean Michael Afbale), an "Emo" cutter who slices up his arms with razorblades, as well as a bunch of other outcasts who are looking for a place to fit in.

Overall, the plot of this movie was very predictable, and whether or not you believe the easy solutions presented by it, depends on your view of the Christian philosophy that goes on throughout. While it has a lot of valuable messages, all the stereotypes and clichés do a disservice to the many worse-off troubled teens out there looking for a lifeline.

Honker Poetry

From Morning to Night

The cluster of gambling new leaves seem like they are having so much fun as they waver in the wind.

Among the trees that gaze up, the sunlight filtering through is inviting, Reaching out my hands, softly, gently, so that they do not disappear, But they never reach paradise, That sea of stars that glisten in the dark When I awake, a cold-hearted moon glares down upon me.

If I follow the memory of the faint remaining traces of light

Tell me, will they recognize me? Such things that have shape tell of the coming of the end

The former darkness flickers.

Time Flies

The obvious and the things one continues to believe in...

The exterior and interior dreams are inverted, and no one knows what is real.

Please do not stop breathing, You can not turn back time.

But fate begins to move in these hands. Lets cross this sea of time,

Gathering glistening tears. This darkness without end,

Repeating regret Tomorrow is created by a dreaming reality. Continuously shaking, The faint light shines in a distance on us.

Inevitably, in places scattered about, we will come across the dream we spoke of.
